

Nate Walkingshaw

Chief Product Officer

Nate, most widely known for his keen product development methodologies and passions, started his first company in 2004 – a medical device start-up named Paramed (now Stryker Medical). In 2011, Nate left Stryker to build Brightface, a product development company, that focused on mobile and web applications. Cycleface was one of those products and was acquired by Strava Corporation, the #1 fitness app for endurance athletes. Nate then became the Chief Research and Development officer of Tanner Labs, a technology research and development division that Nate founded inside O.C. Tanner Recognition Company. Nate's team launched two startups in twelve months.

In January 2015, Nate was named the Chief Product Officer for Pluralsight—a leader in online learning for professionals. As CPO, Nate has crafted a product team that is centered on user experience, and also created collaborative teams including: product managers, UX designers, analysts, persona researchers and a psychologist. His passions are his family, running, biking, burritos and doughnuts.